

Autism. It used to be that thing you weren't quite sure of. It was that thing that you learned out of watching TV's version of Parenthood, or the movies Rain Man or What's Eating Gilbert Grape? It's still not something that impacts every family, but by now, if you think about it, you know someone with a family member that has autism, or have heard about it.

Whether parents are getting the diagnosis earlier, the growing awareness of it in the medical community, the expansion of the mental disorder's classification, or the fact that it's becoming more and more common regardless of these factors, autism now touches everyone. Below illustrates the alarming expansion of those on the autism scale:
